Introduction

In this future tenses speaking activity, students ask about future plans with be going to and to make spontaneous decisions with will.

Procedure

Write the phrase 'change your mind' on the board and elicit the meaning from the class. Ask the students if they ever change their mind about things and ask them to give examples.

Tell the students that they are going to ask and answer questions about their plans for tomorrow and make spontaneous decisions using cards as prompts.

Give each student one folded card. If there are more than ten students in the class, divide them into groups.

Write an example dialogue on the board, indicating the language the students should use during the activity.

Example:

A: Are you going to go to the gym tomorrow?

B: No, I think I'll play tennis.

Explain that Student A asks about Student B's plan for tomorrow, but Student B has changed his or her mind and uses will to make a spontaneous decision. This is why there are two prompts on the 'decision' side of the card. The student makes a decision at the moment of speaking by choosing one of the prompts.

Students then begin the activity. Students hold their card so the side marked 'Plan' is facing them and the side marked 'Decision' is facing away.

Students go around the class or group asking their questions to as many different partners as possible.

When a student asks the question on their card, their partner uses will to make a spontaneous decision about the plan by choosing from the two prompts.

In the activity, students repeat the same question several times, but practice making different decisions each time they change partner.

When the students have spoken to several partners, they exchange cards and repeat the activity. Repeat this several times so the students practice asking different questions each time they change cards.
